Several devices have been publicly known in the context of plain old telephone systems (POTS) prior to the filing date of the above-referenced patent application. These devices permitted testing of POTS lines by a testing technician. Briefly described, the testing technician could place a customer's line in a particular condition to perform testing without the aid of another technician. These devices required the testing technician to call a specific number from the line that was being tested. These devices would answer and perform the desired function, such as opening the line, shorting the line, placing a tone on the line or the commonly used ANAC function. An example of such a test device is a Single Access Serving System (SASS) device from Harris-Dracon of Camarillo, California.
